

WESTERN FIGHTING SCIENCE (BOOK 2 A General Background)

Scientific street-fighting in the 18th century was termed manual-defence. The method was taught by masters of stave and sword and presented as a counter to gratuitous violence. The basis of their philosophy and teaching was giant force in bare fist punching and severe falls in throwing. To be able to perform any physical art as a scientific man - whether bare-fist boxing or wrestling was greatly admired in those days. A manual-defence affirmation goes; A small degree of art will tell for more than a considerably greater strength. (from; A Treatise upon the useful Science of Defence, 1740) The following is a general background to the subjects of wrestling and boxing as components of this art. As with contest forms of weapons arts on the traditional fighting-stage there was also the contest form of manual-defence. In modern times this became known as bareknuckle fighting and almost invariably and erroneously imagined to have been a mere base forerunner of so-called Queensberry glove sport-boxing. This latter subject was actually one practice aspect taken from manual-defence. That aspect was the muffled fist (gloved) practice and training method called sparring or boxing sparring. This was conventionalized in the mid 19th century, principally by gentlemen-amateur groups, to become originally (i.e. early Queensberry era) an amateur athletic game. Our subject is the original art of the pickled fist and self-defence. Included are the realistic views from Old-School followers of the late nineteenth century and mid twentieth century. This article, Book 2 A General Background follows on from Book 1 An Overview of a Western Self-defence Art. Other articles are: Western Fighting Science - Book 3 Mediaeval and Tudor Period. Western Fighting Science - Book 4 Wrestling Arts. Western Fighting Science - Book 5 Street-Fist (Bareknuckle self-defence).
